SUMMER HINTS FOR GARDENERS.

Still Time to Plant Certain Vegetables In This Section.

It is not too late to plant: Kale, Lettuce, Radishes, Beans, Spinach, Peas, Turnips, Carrots.
Washington, D. C., July 16.—Garden space no longer occupied by early-maturing crops such as lettuce, radishes, early peas, string beans, lettuce, cabbage, etc., should be utilized, says the United States Department of Agriculture, by the planting of late cabbage, beets, peas, lettuce, radishes, turnips, string beans, carrots, spinach, or kale. By planting these crops the home gardener should be able to produce food products which may be stored for winter use. There is still time for any of these crops to mature. They should, however, be planted promptly.
At this season many gardeners are inclined to allow the weeds to get a start in the garden. The crops need an abundance of moisture and the weeds should not be allowed to rob them. Where it is possible to practice irrigation either by running water or by hand, with the hose, or by a sprinkler system, the crops may be carried through dry weather without injury. The water should be applied in the evening so that it will soak in before the sun rises. Cultivation should follow the watering in about 24 hours so that the soil will not bake.
It is an excellent plan to water eggplants, peppers, cabbage, cucumbers, melons, celery, and other crops needing highly fertilized soil, with manure water. Have a barrel covered with a fly screen in which to prepare and store the material. An occasional application of the manure will hasten and increase the growth of the plants.
